

World Population Day is observed annually on July 11th to raise awareness about global population issues. It was established by the UNDP in 1989 after the world population reached five billion in 1987. The day focuses on population challenges, family planning, gender equality, reproductive health, and sustainable development. Each year has a different theme, reflecting current global concerns. The objectives include raising awareness, promoting reproductive health and rights, advocating gender equality, and encouraging sustainable development. World Population Day promotes dialogue, partnerships, and action to address population challenges and achieve a more equitable and sustainable future.
